INTERNATIONAL STUDENT/SCHOLAR DEPENDENTS

International students at Miami University who wish to bring their dependents to Oxford to reside until the termination of their studies are asked to take into full consideration the following concerns:

1. Living Costs Living costs in the United States continue to be very high. An error in judgment when estimating the cost of living in Oxford can be the cause of financial distress and emotional problems. There have been cases of domestic problems arising from lack of sufficient income for support of a dependent. When students or their spouses appeal for assistance to various charitable organizations or public agencies for support, this may result in a violation of the student's visa status if it is determined that the student or has become a "public charge".
2. Medical Insurance and Expenses The presently high and continuing rising costs of medical care for families should be seriously considered before students plan to bring their dependents to Oxford. Health and accident, and repatriation and emergency medical insurance is required and the premiums are very expensive while coverage for medical care may be limited. For example, pregnancy, hospitalization, and delivery of a child costs $4500 on the average; any complications can costs much higher.
3. General Adjustment Problems Students should be aware that wives and children may face serious problems of adjustment. Such factors as language, food, socializing, shopping, and schooling, can be major concerns for wives and children.
4. Isolation Spouses of international students may experience isolation and feelings of neglect as a result of students being engaged in work and study activities for long periods of time. The pressure of exams, term papers, and other academic assignments may make it difficult for student to discharge adequately the responsibilities of husband/wife, father/mother, and student, thereby straining family relationships.
5. Employment Restrictions Immigration law places severe restrictions on employment of international student spouses (F-2 visa holders). Immigration regulations prohibit their employment under any circumstances. Furthermore, a change of visa status from "F" to "J" will not be considered by the Immigration Service if the sole purpose of applying is to allow the spouse to be employed. Illegal employment can be grounds for deportation for both the student and the dependent(s).
6. Financial Guarantees The Office of International Programs will not issue a visa document for a dependent until the student is able to provide evidence that adequate funds are available for the dependent's support. Documentation from a bank or sponsor is required for us to issue a visa document, and will be needed when your dependent applies for a visa. Some students have borrowed from friends and deposited the money in their bank account until it has served its purpose of showing "proof of ability to support the spouse in the United States." The funds are then returned. This type of misrepresentation creates more problems than it solves.

The Office of International Programs is sincerely concerned with the success of our students at Miami University. Separation from a spouse is difficult to bear, but the prospect of having a dependent here with inadequate means for support or for return travel to the home country can be tragically worse. The best advice that we can give is that international students bring their families to Oxford only if they can bear the costs of additional expenses here and pay for passage home when study is terminated. The alternative is to risk interruption of both academic and professional plans.
